Not illustrated. 1909 Excerpt: ...sinus is then exposed by removing the cortex of the mastoid which covers it. This may be found dense or necrotic. Extradural abscess of the sinus may perhaps be discovered and evacuated. The sinus, being clearly exposed to view, is carefully examined. If the vein is normal it shows a dark blue color and a lustrous surface. On touching with the finger, it is easily compressible and feels soft and resilient. A probe or dissector, laid across the vessel and pressed down, causes it to flatten below the obstruction, while it remains full and convex above it. If the wall of the vessel is inflamed it has lost a part of its surface luster and deep blue color. Touch with the finger may find the wall abnormally resistant, but whether because the inflammatory thickening or from the presence of thrombus within, it may be impossible to determine by external examination. It then becomes necessary to open the vessel. It was formerly advised to aspirate it with a hypodermic needle. But it is better and safer to open it with a carefully sterilized narrow-bladed knife. The incision is made lengthwise of the vessel. If the blood flows freely there is certainly no thrombotic occlusion. But if the blood fails to flow the incision should be enlarged upward nearly but not quite to the limit of the bony opening. With a small blunt spoon curette the contents of the sinus are then examined. The clot below the opening is scooped out until the blood flows freely. Then the vein below the opening is compressed by the finger or a sponge of iodoform gauze, while the thrombus is removed from above and the vessel flushed out by bleeding. The bony canal both above and below the opening is then plugged by packing with a strip of iodoform gauze, thus compressing and occluding the vessel at bot...
