Excerpt from Landmarks of History: Middle Ages; From the Reign of Charlemagne, to That of Charles V

Certain caterpillars are said to spin a number of different threads, all forming one loop, through which they proceed to creep, so judiciously holding the strands apart, that no two of them ever become entangled.

In weaving the warp and woof of the History of the Middle Ages, it would be most desirable to possess the skill of the insect; since, instead of the one broad line of Roman Empire, the threads of the story do indeed present a complex web, often more tangled in the mind than in reality.

It has been attempted to class the subjects, according to the periods when some general object or idea influenced most of the historical countries; looking on the Landmarks rather as a sketch of European events, than as a history of any individual state or country, in the hope that they may be found useful in connecting other more detailed records.
